

Dunlop, Keynes & Steiner

13 May to 7 June

Architects of World Economy

We live in the time of a one-world economy. If we can recognise what this means, both in terms of ideas and practice, policies and institutions, and if we can echo this fact in the way we understand and organise our affairs, then we can overcome today's constant instability, an instability not born of nature but of a wrong image.

This exhibition explores a different image – that of a single, shared global economy. It examines this idea through the work of three of its foremost advocates: Daniel Nichol Dunlop, a Scottish businessman, John Maynard Keynes, the main architect of twentieth century economics and Rudolf Steiner, the father of 'associative economics'.
